The gorgeous coloring of the Austra lian floral kingdom is hardly to be excelled anywhere. Among the favorite pative flowers is the stately waratah, or native tulip, as it is sometimes in correctly designed. It grows to the height of four or five feet, the slender stem being surmounted by a large dahlia-shaped flower of the deepest crimson. It is sometimes grown as a garden flower, but thrives best in the ush. The native rose, which has no resemblance save in its delicate pink dint to the favorite garden flower, is exceedingly plentiful. The blossom is small and modest, but wonderfully enduring and forms a charming additio to an Australian bouquet. The rock lily, of which a beautifu specimen, imbedded in ice, was lately sent to the queen, is so called from its being most abundant in rocky country where its masses of yellowish-white blossoms stand out in picturesque relief from the dense background of dark green foliage.
